Looking up in the sky, you can only see one or two stars at most. This is because in 80 percent of the world, light pollution is turning night into day.

When artificial light (人造光) and natural light mix together, insects, birds and even plants are affected seriously. A 2022 report surveyed more than 160 species (物种) to understand how artificial light changes ecosystem. The researchers found that animals watched the light of the sun and moon to plan their activities. Breaking the law of light can affect all kinds of wildlife. Birds are easy to get lost because of bright city lights. The short-wave blue light produced by LED bulbs (灯泡) will attract more insects and birds. Fireflies (萤火虫) light the forests. They communicate with each other through their own light, but artificial light mixes the messages they want to express, making it harder for them to live.

Unlike air and water pollution, light pollution can be solved immediately. Reducing light pollution is simple by turning off the lights, limiting the time on or reducing the light from a single bulb.

Asalam, a scientist, said, “The type of light that we use is very important. For birds, if you use warmer, yellow light, you won’t have so much effect on them.”

Street lights and outdoor lights with lampshades (灯罩) can concentrate light directly where we need it, preventing them from leaking (泄露) outward or upward.

Closing your blinds (百叶窗) and closing the curtains will prevent artificial light from entering the environment. A study found that simply halving the light outside the window reduced the birds’ effects by 60 percent.

In order to protect our friends living on the same earth, please let our city be dark.
